

GOORNEH TEMPLE.

47

An Interior View.

NEARLY the whole of the chambers lying outside the main hall are in ruins, though enough of the walls are left standing to enable the inscriptions to be traced and translated.

The photograph represents one of the lateral chambers, with sculptures on the left-hand walls.

Excepting the façade, there is little in this temple to interest any one but the Egyptologist. To the artist or photographer it offers few attractions, the building being in most cases a chaos of stone, piled up in such a manner as effectually to prevent any picturesque view being secured.
